

The original detachment building comprised a small office and an attached garage. It was determined that future renovations would not yield acceptable quarters for the growing detachment, nor incorporate modern police methods and systems. As such, a replacement building was required.

The replacement structure incorporates the latest technology and security systems and requirements of the OPP. The building houses two very distinct areas that are separated by both construction type and function. One portion of the building incorporates cells, interview rooms, bull pen, breath testing, booking and other related functions. Constructed of masonry, precast concrete and other highly durable materials, this portion contrasts with the administrative areas that are more office-like and incorporate modern communications, data and security systems.
